During the building process there are a few inspections that most municipalities require. This will be of the building and the standard of work done, these are briefly explained in the following slides. When plans are first submitted the building inspector will do a site inspection to see if the planned house will fit on the site and if the building will be within the allowed building lines. Foundation trenches must be inspected and approved before the concrete is placed. When all the walls have been built up and have reached roof height the next inspection will be done; this could be combined with the next level - roof trusses. The building inspector might want the roof trusses to be erected and in place for the inspection at this stage. This you should ask at the start so you follow the correct procedure. All plumbing fixtures and fittings as well as the sewage connections may be inspected, checked, tested and must be approved before the trenches are backfilled. When the final completion inspection is done, an occupation certificate will be issued and the owner can take possession of the house and move in and finish off the interior. So if you are planning to build, this is a document you should familiarise yourself with. Each of the regulations listed here is published as a separate document by the SABS.
