The Whole World Knows April 3, in Short Story | Tags: Eudora Welty, Short Story, Southern Literature, The Golden Apples This is a disturbing story about a very unhappy man.

I was blessed to go to college with dear brothers who are making an impact for Christ all over the world. It is wonderful to stay in touch with these guys and hear what they are doing. One such dear friend is Jeremiah Hambrick. Ever so godly, talented, and humble, Jeremiah and his family are committed to the Great Commission. It seeks to help them become missionary churches! Here is some info on what Jeremiah and his ministry does: Until The Whole World Knows is a non-profit organization that is focused on resourcing churches and individuals to make a global impact with the good news of Jesus. Imagine working in the same place, with same community, the same Pastor, church, mission for 5, 10, or 15 years! Think about the growth you would see and have an integral part in. The kids you would watch grow and people you would become friends with. Your pictures would have names and stories behind the faces, and your communication would be personal and real. To us, thats mission work at its finest. Until the Whole World Knows works with churches and overseas ministries to help foster intentional partnerships that benefit both the church and mission, and help to make a meaningful and lasting impact for the Gospel. UTWWK strives to connect your church to a ministry overseas. Once you are connected, we will help train, prepare, and lead your team so you can focus on building a relationship, in the hopes that your church then commits to a long-term partnership and continues the work of spreading the Gospel together! After returning home from this trip, our pastor and I felt God leading our church to a part of His work in Haiti. As missions committee chairman, I contacted Jim at Until The Whole World Knows, who had helped lead our trip, to guide us through the process of planning our short-term mission trips to Haiti. UTWWK helped us plan everything from beginning to end. No time is wasted trying to figure out what needs to be done or how and when we will do it. The relationships Until The Whole World Knows have established with pastors and ministries in Haiti have proven invaluable to our church. They introduced us to the ministries and encouraged us to prayerfully consider where and how God was leading us to become involved. They have helped us establish long term relationships that will last for many years as we come along side our brothers and sisters in Haiti to help them reach their communities with the Gospel. UTWWK consistently updates us on status and needs of the various ministries we work with. Start a conversation with us. We will contact you and send you a brief survey that will give us a few more details about your church and what missions experience and strengths your church has. We will meet with your church to help you cast vision, prepare, train, and lead your church on their first trip with us. We will work hard to help you establish a long-term partnership that you can continue for years to come. Where we are and who we are working with. Check back often for updates! If you would like more information on how Jeremiah and his team can help you and your church, you can contact them here: Until The Whole World Knows.

Chapter 2 : Gospel preached to whole world, and then the end will come!

However, boy am I hearing an awful lot about Rep. Jeff Fortenberry, and the one thing I will now always associate with Rep. This story has a bit of everything. It starts with this, however. What happened next, however Someone else made some additions to the sign. Someone else took a photo. Someone else posted it to Facebook. The sole thing that Kohen did was click the "like" button because he found it amusing. Kohen then called Archer back, and they ended up talking for 53 whole minutes , though the key 7 minutes gives you a good taste of what went down. Amusingly, if you listen to the full call, it starts out with Archer specifically saying: Humor has changed a lot over the last five years. What we thought was funny The call goes on and on like this, with there being two main complaints, both of which are bullshit: This is an endorsement of vandalism and even potentially "violence" and From there, Archer "threatens" to "put this out there": And frankly we have a 1st amendment opportunity to put you out there in front of everybody and put it clearly as "why is a professor liking vandalism? Would you like that? Kohen, who certainly seems to have a much better grasp of the optics here, points out to Archer how that might backfire: Because the [disbelieving laugh] optics of this are terrible Reyn. Archer then complains that he was calling to "come to an accommodation" and is frustrated that it seems "that is not possible with you. To which Archer, hilariously replies: Since this went public late yesterday, tons of publications have picked up this story. They all seem to be reflecting pretty negatively on Fortenberry and his chief of staff. Speaking of his chief of staff, Archer seems to have a bit of a history of being controversial himself. The first President Bush appointed him as the head of "Family Planning" at the Department of Health and Human Services, leading to a bunch of complaints about his lack of qualifications for the job: Archer said he remains ready to work with them. Indeed, when Fortenberry hired Archer in , he had to defend the hiring over those comments. Some of those comments came from wait for it Anyway, back to the call. Kohen continues to ask why this conversation is even happening, and Archer keeps falsely stating that Kohen was supporting vandalism, and then makes various references to other professors getting negative publicity over their political views, with Kohen accurately pointing out that those were all very different situations. This makes absolutely no sense at all. We all live in an ecosystem in which all these things hold together. Are you familiar with Felton Earls in broken windows at Harvard. The conversation keeps going around in circles, and then Kohen correctly notes what this is: Archer then responds in a way that suggests he has I think there are limitations and problems created by both the left and the right around this issue. And I think that there should not be a chilling effect on your right to speak about ideas. But if you tell someone to go blow up a bomb, or you tell somebody to go vandalize, or you validate and say an inference that vandalism is a part of political discourse, by inference, you have to be careful about whether your are constraining yourself in the context of the 1st Amendment, in which We all know that this is a very complicated area. At the same time, the way we do it, also allows us to continue to do it. To be in this robust conversation with each other. Either way, the call goes on and on and on, around and around for nearly an hour. Incredibly, Kohen tries, multiple times, to end the call, and Archer just keeps wanting it to go on, and pressing Kohen to somehow apologize for clicking the like button. Still, by the end the two end the call on a more friendly note and have a conversation about getting past political differences and improving government -- which is great.

Chapter 3 : The Whole World Knows Poem by Rubz Verano - Poem Hunter

Until the Whole World Knows, Jacksonville, FL. likes. To reach the World with the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

In a disaster entirely of his own making, the President of the United States stood alongside Vladimir Putin at a press conference in Helsinki, Finland on July 16, and confirmed to the entire world what so many of us already knew: Donald John Trump has betrayed his duty to America, and acts as though he is beholden to and under undue influence of Putin in ways that constitute an extraordinary betrayal of his oath of office. Because Trump has been silent on the matter, we still have virtually no specifics about what Trump discussed and promised to Putin in their private meeting. US offers no details as Russia claims Trump and Putin reached military agreements. The Man in the High Castle: How can anyone still support him? The world sees it. There really are Americans who truly want America to move away from democracy towards authoritarianism, particularly if an authoritarian leader pretends to support their political and social agenda and remove it from possible change via democratic processes. There are Americans who support Trump because they profit greatly from his policies and agenda, and some of them are extremely wealthy and their wealth can and does buy political influence. There are Americans who truly want to see the subjugation of America to Russia. And there is a segment of Americans who will refuse to back away from Trump because it would mean admitting that they were wrong about something that they were once passionate about, so they will just keep digging in no matter what he does. We are forced to conclude that even if Trump should publicly come out and claim that he wants to make the United States a republic in the Russian Federation, a sizable portion of his supporters would applaud him for having another brilliant idea, while repeating the gaslighting distortions he manufactures to justify it. Their political agenda and the best interests of America tend to be rather less important than any of these three factors. Again, this is the world we live in, and the priority on raising funds will remain until America enacts significant campaign finance reform. On the Republican side, big money donors are putting great pressure on Congressional representatives to maintain their support of Trump, because they financially benefit from his presidency in a variety of both obvious and nefarious ways. There also appears to be a self-preservation factor at play for some of the Republican representatives if Trump falls, they know that they will fall as well. It is becoming clearer with each passing day that some segment of the Republican representatives in Congress have legal and ethical entanglements that concern them, and that will likely be uncovered if Mueller is allowed to continue his investigation, or if Democrats gain control of key House committees. Some, like Devin Nunes, appear to have potentially engaged in obstruction of justice and other crimes and ethical violations in trying to protect Trump. Evidence is also emerging that Russia was using the NRA, and perhaps others, to funnel money to Trump and others in ways that could entangle many in campaign financing violations and could dry up a source of money they have relied upon. Are Republicans Covering for Trump, or for Themselves? Members of Congress who are not planning to run for reelection are under less influence from these factors, but even those members, unless they are terminally ill, look to a potential post-Congress future earning money as lobbyists, board members, law firm members, judges or running for other political office. Their connections for enabling their post-Congress life all lie within their political party, and they know whom they have to please to meet such objectives. So Congressional candidates know that if they oppose Trump in the primary season, they will lose their primary to other Republican candidates who support Trump. But in the final election, being a Trump supporter is going to be a liability in most of America. Incumbent Republicans up for reelection in November feel that if they show any disloyalty to Trump they will immediately lose the support of the gaslighted, and they need those votes, both in the primaries and in November. Trump has pretty much put them into a no win situation and they know it, but they still feel supporting him is their best option. But next year is not an election year. If the Republicans get beat badly this November, it will send a strong message that supporting Trump does not lead to re-election. And they will vote to impeach Trump, and initiate a trial in the Senate to convict and remove him from office. The votes of 67 Senators will be necessary to remove Trump from office. So for that to happen, approximately 18 Republicans in the Senate will need to come to believe their chances of getting re-elected in or later are better under a Pence presidency than under a Trump presidency. Without the pressures of a re-election year in , it is feasible, but by no means guaranteed, that it could happen. It will depend in large part on how badly Republicans lose elections this coming November. If they get beat badly enough, Republican incumbents in the Senate will come to realize that supporting Trump is a possible death sentence when they next come up for re-election. I think the Senate race in Texas is going to be critical. It should be THE story, all day every day. VOTE â€” David Hogg davidhogg July 22, Through the collective action of millions, there is a real chance we can bring many aspects of this sad chapter of American history to an end in Each one of us, with our individual contribution to the effort, can help make a positive difference now in six key ways: Take to the streets in mass protest. It scares the crap out of most politicians to see hundreds of thousands of people so mad at them that they are willing to take the streets and turn their anger into hope. Remember that the most effective protests are both peaceful and visibly patriotic. In this context, dancing, singing, laughing and refusing to be silenced in the face of your adversary is more effective than throwing rocks at them. They did so with both passion and humour. Will Americans take to the streets in a serious way if Vladamir Putin sets foot in the US at the behest of our traitorous president? Why The Whole Freaking World Knows That Rep. Jeff Fortenberry Hates Being Called Fartenberry from the don't-threaten-people dept.

Sustained hard work is the ingredient to success that this Pittsfield native truly obsesses over. Am I working hard enough? In December, Raiche real name: Kelie owns the year-old parlor where Raiche said she first learned to "hustle. Madison, then a student at Suffolk University in Boston, had to return home to work the front desk. She worked for the better part of three years at Essencials. It was a team effort. It was a family effort. We finally are getting back on our feet," Kelie said. Raiche stayed busy at Essencials. During her senior year of high school, she started recording videos of herself covering famous songs. Kelie started bringing Raiche to vocal practices when she was about 6 years old. Madison was also strong musically. She quit chorus early on. You had to wake up so early," she said. Much of her musical development occurred outside the halls of LMHS, including during a Music in Common program that exposed her to a variety of different cultures. By then, she had developed a wide range of musical tastes. Early in life, she was exposed to gospel artists such as Kirk Franklin. Later on, she had a "dark little rock-y phase" — Relient K, Secondhand Serenade. But for her covers, Raiche chose popular artists such as Adele and Ariana Grande. Essencials was her favorite place to record. It echoes in here," she said. He started following her on Instagram. When Raiche returned to Pittsfield, she began posting videos again. He could also intuit something else: He decided to schedule a meeting with her and a group that eventually became her Genre Defying Entertainment production team. Intrigued, he and Raiche began working on "Money Pies" about a year ago in Atlanta, where Raiche has now recorded roughly two albums worth of music. For Madison, managing Raiche allows her to fulfill her own dreams; in school, she studied business and performing arts. Now, they both feel that their relationship has grown stronger because of the arrangement. She still surprises them. All involved are aware of the "snakes" in the music industry. Within the next couple of months, Raiche will be releasing another single and, if that goes well, an album will follow. I want to perform well. I want to have a good voice.

Eudora Welty's rather long short story The Whole World Knows (I like the title but couldn't recall it exactly and had to look it up after completing this post), about the dissolution of Ran McLain's marriage, in her collection The Golden Apples in "Collected Stories" - is definitely one of her most imaginative and one of her best.
