Write (Or Is That "Right"?) Every Time provides a fun-and-easy way to tackle tenses, sort out spelling slip-ups, put a full stop to punctuation problems, and conquer.

Written by Courtney Carver By recognizing that you kill dreams , you just took the first step in creating your best life. If you have really decided to see a dream as an opportunity, instead of a waste of time, living life your way is just around the corner. That crazy idea could be your future. You may have noticed that as you get older, time seems to move faster. Summers are shorter, you often run behind, and spend more time than ever before catching up. No matter how we perceive the passing of time, the fact is, that the clock is ticking. Three easy steps to start dreaming again: Make a list of all of your dreams. Do not censor this list. Here is your permission: Do not waste your life living a life that you did not intend to live. For inspiration, go for a walk, lay down in the grass and look up, draw a picture, cook a beautiful meal. Connect with dream makers see my list below. Make a dream come true. Circle three things on your list that you can accomplish in the next week, and do them. Pick a big dream. Use the momentum from living three of your dreams, and circle three big ones. Yes, even that one that you think you can never bring to life. Now that you have three big dreams, here comes the tough part. Choose the one that makes your heart smile. Write it down on a separate piece of paper and tape it to your mirror in the bathroom, or somewhere you can see it everyday. Making dreams instead of breaking them can be a big transition, but considering you only get one life, it is worth the effort to decide to change. You can choose to change and that is so cool! You need the momentum from 2 to attack 3 with confidence. Assuming that you have written down and taped your 1 dream or big idea somewhere you can see it everyday, the idea is gaining energy. You are thinking about it often. Now that you know how to dream again, it is time to start turning dreams into reality. How to make a dream come true: Dream it â€” Follow through on steps above. Focus â€” It is ok to keep dreaming, but give a certain amount of time every day to your 1. Devote 15 minutes or more each day to making your dream come true. Track your progress in a journal or Google doc. Write down ideas, questions, anything that will move you closer to living your dream. Be realistic â€” If this dream is going to come to life, you will have to get real with it. Make a list of every obstacle you can think of standing between you and your dream. Tell someone â€” Be proud of your dream. Tell a friend over the phone or the world through a blog. Be flexible â€” As you address the obstacles, and start talking more about your dream, you may find you want something slightly or radically different from the original idea. Letting go is not the same as giving up, and progress does not look the same for everyone. Your life may seem very defined. Maybe you have settled in or hunkered down. You might not want to make waves. That being said, if you are reading this blog, and others like it, you know that path of least resistance will kill you. Dream big and act bigger. Take the necessary steps to live your dream. It might take months or years or decades, but getting there will start to be as amazing as being there. Waiting for the kids to finish school, or to be out of debt, or until you lose 20 lbs will keep you right where you are. Fear of looking silly? What could be more scary than living a life that passed you by? What could be worse than going day to day feeling uninspired, unmotivated and stuck. Feeling silly, facing fear, and being a little crazy will help you choose to change. Admit it, embrace it, fix it and move forward. This is the right time, your perfect moment to start living life on purpose. The right time is right now, what are you waiting for?

Achieving perfection meant that something was being true to its nature. Is something imperfect because it is not symmetrical? Is a tree perfect? What about a sunset? What about your children playing in the backyard, running and laughing in the rain, stomping in puddles, filled with joy and immersed in the moment? Are they lacking anything? I sure hope not. A tree is not perfect because its branches are exactly straight. A sunset is not perfect because it has the same beautiful hues every evening. A child playing is not perfect because she is following the rules or doing what is expected of her. No, all of these are examples of perfection because they are complete, not lacking anything. Something does not have to be pristine for it to be perfect. Realize that it already is perfect. It just has to be what it is. And that realization will make your work better. Who am I to tell if something is good or bad? A better question than perfection The world is notorious for getting these things wrong over and over. We tend to miss the geniuses in our midst until they are gone—or even sometimes murdered for their radical views. And why does this matter? A better question is this: Gordon Mackenzie spent his career at Hallmark. He saw the company grow from a scrappy band of misfit artists into a corporate giant. His solution was to orbit. To be in the system but not of it. His role was to sit in an office all day long and tell people if their ideas were any good. He did this for years, seeing fellow artists and illustrators at Hallmark, answering their questions about their ideas. They needed to know if the art they were pursuing was good enough to keep going. Years later, Gordon confessed publicly to telling everyone he saw that their ideas were good. When someone criticized him about this, he explained that he did this for two reasons: Nobody knew that he was telling everyone their ideas were good, so each person felt like the encouragement was both special and personal, and it was. Gordon understood that a bad idea, regardless of how many people encourage you, will ultimately fail, because it is a bad idea. But a good idea, without the proper encouragement, could be abandoned before it was truly given a chance to succeed. About this business idea you have. Be true to it. Make it, dance with it, create it. Who are they to judge your idea? Who, moreover, are you? There is only one question you should ask of your art: It means complete, and the way that you do that is by deciding who this work is for and what you want to do with it. Then, you make that art, write that book, record that song. You do it well and unapologetically without concerns about achieving a certain standard of excellence, because everyone has a different standard. But what about success? Success has always been a bad indicator of the quality of a piece of work, anyway. Because the only wrong way to do it is to not do it. To abort the idea before it even has a chance of living. It just might be perfect. Focus on creating something perfect—that is, something that is whole, not lacking anything. It is better to be whole than it is to be good. Parker Palmer This is your art, and this is your life. And there is nothing wrong with it or you. And it will be perfect, precisely because you are not trying to make it flawless.
