Leave a comment Small Breaks With Year-Round Schooling In the standard school schedule, students need a bit of a refresher at the beginning of the school year. We started with this same schedule, but soon life caused us to change to a year-round schooling model that actually helped a great deal. With year-round homeschooling, we were able to take breaks when we needed them. Often breaks centered around holidays and our extra-curricular activities, such as the 4H county and state fairs. The year-round schooling schedule also helped when we had out-of-town guests or if someone felt ill. Special Learners Benefit from Year-Round Schooling While all of our children benefited from the continual learning approach, the advantages to those with special learning needs proved even more so. Often, children with learning challenges struggle to retain the information they have been given. We have found repetition to be especially useful for these challenges. However, even a two-week break causes some setback, and a two-month break even more. We reinforce newly learned skills and facts with repetition. Practice makes perfect is more than a motto; indeed, it is a very true statement for all of our lives. Practicing something causes it to become part of us. With enough practice, even difficult skills become easier. Likewise, learning that is continual proves naturally easier to acquire. Life, A Continual Learning Cycle Imagine trying to learn to master a skill, perhaps that of riding a bike. You need help at first. Your dad helps you balance as you learn to pedal and direct your bike. In time, you are off on your own, still learning to navigate, but able to do so without physical help. Continue perfecting the skill and you might become a marathon biker! However, what if you could only practice for a few days. Then you did not even try for several weeks. You again attempt, but take more time off. Your career as a marathon biker might be delayed or even not happen. That is why athletes, such as ice skaters, practice for many hours each day. Similarly, musicians practice their skills daily. And, those with greater learning challenges often need even more practice. They are not incapable, but need consistency and practice. Taking a day or two off may not be a big setback, but taking ten weeks probably will hinder. Life Skills, Real Life Patterns In addition to the day-to-day benefits, we found that for our family, it was a more natural life process. Most adults work through the calendar year, rather than taking summers off. Even those teaching in traditional schools often hold a summer job. Our children have learned to follow the natural pattern of adult life, while learning in a continuous manner, through year-round schooling. Will This Work for Your Family? For our family this proved to be a much better solution than following the traditional school calendar. Our children had the advantages of mini-breaks when they were needed. And, they did not need as many refreshers when we began a subject. In fact, we often were able to skim the first couple of chapters of review information and move into the new material. Moreover, when our children have been asked about their school schedules, they happily explain how they have time off when they need it. Please follow and like us:

In lieu of an abstract, here is a brief excerpt of the content: She tickled my chubby middle and giggled when I stood back, startled. My daughter, you should go play with your cousins. Kids were forbidden from playing in the bedrooms too, so we were left with the linoleum strip of hallway. Unlike most of my cousins, I adored Barbies and Pogo balls and puffy-painted tops. My sisters, parents, and I lived in a neighborhood where the only nighttime sound was a recycle bin rattling down a driveway. My parents agreed that education was important. It was the reason they had left their homeland of Guatemala and, later, had abandoned Boston with its ethnic intimacy. They believed the suburbs meant [End Page 39] securityâ€”good schools, organized sports, a library down the street. My mother pushed the idea of college on us before we could write in cursive. We took elective classes in French and read chapter books for fun. Many of my cousins, on the other hand, lived in Section 8 housing and changed schools often. But when we were all together, in the pocket of Friday night, we were the same. We played checkers and compared our favorite scenes in The Goonies. We played Go Fish with a sticky deck of cards. Eventually, we would teach Yolanda how to play too. My grandmother sat closest to Yolanda, who was eating a Boston Kreme donut. Yolanda wore a long cotton skirt and a Celtics jacket. I leaned closer and snatched what I could: You must take care of yourself. That was something we constantly heard. Be careful swimming or you might drown like Monica almost did one summer. You must take care of yourself implied a further concern. That spring we celebrated my birthday with a barbecue at Larz Anderson Park. Surrounded by shades of green, my cousins and I were allowed to be as loud as we wanted without downstairs neighbors calling the cops to complain about them spics. I was thirteen, so I was too old to play tag. Instead I sat at You are not currently authenticated. View freely available titles:

Although I have been extremely busy, I always find time for the best of the best He has been busy advising me into taking more time alone with Him. And so I have agreed to obey! I have claimed a nice little spot in my backyard under this great, old, massive oak tree, and have made it my place of "worship. In the midst of my quiet time the Lord has been teaching me more about "His flow" and instructing me on less participation of the "worlds flow". It was during this time that I discovered the awesome vegan website ohsheglows. Angela is such a gifted blogger, and an amazing vegan cook. She and her husband are both vegans, and she incorporates an incredible selection of raw foods. Some recipes can be prepared ahead of time, freeze them, and pull them out when you need them. This was my breakfast today, after my workout at the gym. If you an an early morning eater then by all means you can certainly have this even before your workout, I chose to have it after because I am not an early morning eater. First thing in the morning I make myself a Green smoothie, and an hour later a cup of either Green tea, or Camomile tea. For energy and strength, remember to eat some protein and some carbs before your workout. Nick English wrote a great article about the "12 Complete Vegetarian Proteins. What an amazing dish! This deliciousness consists of: Avocado slices as many as you can fit on the slice of Ezequiel bread. A sprinkle of some Hemp seeds, Chia seeds, and ground Flax seeds. Fresh fruit of your choice. But you can have whatever fruit you have at hand, or skip the fruit all together if you prefer. My beverage was a delicious and refreshing concoction of: This is something I do once every 3 to 4 months, just to keep my "pipes" clean and healthy. So there you have it my friends Simple, filling, healthy, easy and yummy!
